since we are now living in the “modern” age of hybrid vehicles it will not be long before we will all be flying off to work with our jet packs and using our hybrid vehicles only for trips with the family or other groups of people. But, for now, if we care anything for the environment, the very least we can do is buy the hybrid.

ETHOS PARAGRAPH: Ethos plays a moderate role here by asking us to trust Hyundai because they have our future and our best interest at heart by hybridizing one of their standard vehicles. Americans have long been targets of the wizards of the advertising world of Madison Avenue and their attempts to play on a company’s trustworthiness. This especially holds true when dealing with our ever changing obsession with saving our planet and our need to nurture the environment. Whether Global warming is real or imagined is irrelevant in today’s advertising market. The agencies responsible for mass marketing the global warming phenomenon have found willing participants in the American public. Hyundai is only the latest automobile manufacturer to use this approach with their new hybrid, the Sonata. The trust factor here is directed at a select few since we can all probably acknowledge that those who will buy the Hyundai Sonata Hybrid are going to be limited since hybrids are not the most cost efficient vehicles to purchase. Hyundai had to spend a few million, if not tens of millions, of dollars researching and developing this product and compared to the standard model it isn’t cheap. The market will be fairly small for those that will spend more on a hybrid than the identical non-hybrid vehicle simply to be eco-conscious and Hyundai knows that. The ethos here is for a specific target group that is looking to buy a hybrid, Hyundai or not.

LOGOS PARAGRAPH: It would be difficult to make the argument that this ad depicts much, if any, logos. There is not much logic involved, at least not yet, with the imagery of a man
